Commemorating:

Person/group or event: Bryan Wardley Jackson

Reason: Bryan Jackson was a well-known identity in Auckland from the early 1950's until his death in 2015. Although his early endeavours centred around his successful caravan, and other business ventures, his most significant contribution to Auckland and New Zealand as a whole, revolved around his tireless work in restoring and exhibiting antiques and vintage cars in his two public Museums, Bryan Jackson's Muzeum of Sound, Light, and Transport, in Marua Rd, Mount Wellington, and Jackson's Muzeum in the Old Devonport Post Office, in Victoria Avenue. He restored and preserved tens of thousands of relics, a vast array of artifacts, that would otherwise have been lost to future generations, including over fifty vintage cars, building fixtures, music boxes, lighting, toys, postcards, pratt jars, hats, whole themed rooms, and countless more. Bryan donated many items to the Auckland War Memorial Museum, and MOTAT, amongst others, many of which are currently on display, and was a generous supporter to many Clubs and Associations, including the Vintage Car Club, the Bottle Club and the Tool Club, etc.

Brayan was sort after for his general knowledge, and his expertise and experience in restoring antiques, by local and international collectors, and was known by enthusiasts all over the world. However, one of Bryan's greatest passions was contributing too, and supporting the local businesses and residents of Devonport. He gave generously to the local Probus club, which relied heavily on his contributions, and also provided support to locals who were going through tough times. He paid for people's dental work, reestablishment costs after a fire, and travel expenses for local children who hoped to compete in sporting competitions.

In short, it would be a huge shame for my father's contributions to Devonport and to the preservation of New Zealand's history to go unnoticed and pass into shadow, without the attention he so generously and lovingly gave to preserving these priceless examples of our past, being recognized and remembered.
